

Asbestos can be found in many homes in the UK that were built before the year 2000.

If asbestos materials are undamaged or they are in places where they cannot easily be disturbed, there is no significant risk to health.

It is only when they are broken up and small fibres are released and breathed in that they may pose a possible health risk.

The most likely asbestos materials in your home are:

- Textured finishes
- Ceiling tiles and vinyl floor tiles
- Asbestos cement sheets (flat and corrugated) used as roofing, wall cladding and gutters.

Asbestos legislation:

UK legislation requires landlords to identify asbestos containing materials (ACMs) only within 'common areas' of their properties and make a plan to manage the asbestos. There is no legal requirement to identify ACMs within domestic properties.

Our policy on asbestos is in line with the Government and Health and Safety Executive recommendations: to leave asbestos in place unless it is in an unsatisfactory condition or is likely to be subject to frequent disturbances, or if it can be removed as part of a repair, improvement or alteration.

To comply with current legislation, we have carried out asbestos surveys of communal areas in our properties. We have also decided to go further and carry out an asbestos survey programme to identify ACMs in many customers' homes.

We also conduct surveys before commencing major repairs and improvements to ensure that we don't accidentally damage any asbestos materials.

Asbestos removal:

It is not practical to remove every piece of material containing asbestos from every home. ACMs, if in good condition, present no risk to the health of you or your family.

Asbestos and DIY:

You can carry out decorating and DIY, but you must take note of the advice relating to asbestos that may be present in your home. Asbestos should not be drilled, sanded, rubbed down or disturbed in any other way. If in doubt, please call our Customer Solutions
